BARK is an animal assisted therapeutic group program for children affected by family violence.

The group is held at the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals (RSPCA) centre in Malaga.

It is a six week program, for primary school aged children, held after school and includes afternoon tea.

Each session runs from 3.30-5pm, the children will spend time with small animals that are used to being handled (guinea pigs, rabbits and cats). Very few children have a strong negative reaction to small animals unlike dogs which can cause anxiety.

The group program is facilitated by a Children's counselor, a child support worker and the RSPCA animal educator, the program promotes empathy, healing and trust in primary aged children who have witnessed and/or experienced family violence.

The children will be taught how to safely handle and care for the animal by using the animal as the focus of conversation about physical and emotional safety; children can identify when the animal is relaxed and when it's nervous. Noticing and interpreting the feelings of another and changing their behavior helps children demonstrate empathy.

The group process allows children to discuss their own experiences of past pets and family events (violence). This reduces their sense of isolation, allows for peers to model positive interactions with animals and each other.

Witnessing parent and pet abuse may compromise children's psychological adjustment, increase their propensity for interpersonal violence (via observational learning and/or identification with the aggressor) and make children's cruelty to animals more likely to emerge as a symptom of their distress..."
